SYNOPSIS

ACT I

PROLOGUE: TAKING THE MASK Out of time. The god Dionysus reveals that he had come down to earth centuries before; he'd warned the people of Thebes not to deny his power, lest they experience his revenge. They learned their lesson, bloodily; but now their descendants have forgotten it. He must return, to Victorian, Christian London; but that city won't listen to him in the persona of a god of the Greeks. What identity should he assume to make them understand?

CHORUS: LONDON IN CHAOS London, 1897. The Chorus sings, and a newspaper Correspondent tells, of an epidemic: London's young women are being hypnotized into leaving their bedrooms and wandering into London's parks, where they encounter three strange Sisters in white. When they return, they are half-enchanted, and slightly wounded in the throat. The city teeters on the brink of chaos; London's Lord Mayor Seward has died of fright, and in their terror the people have turned to his only son—Doctor John Seward, leader of Carfax Asylum, “father and comfort of London's mad”—to stop the scourge and save the city. Seward has imposed martial law, imprisoning the city's young women too, which disturbs the city's freethinkers; but his guards did capture the Sisters. The Correspondent observes that the Sisters did not resist arrest, singing only of “our brother, our master: the Lord of Cries! Deny him not his place...”

JONATHAN IN MADNESS Seward's chambers in Carfax Asylum; also, the ruin of Carfax Abbey. Jonathan Harker, straitjacketed, raves incoherently. Seward explains to the senior Dr. Van Helsing that “some petty boyar from the East” claimed ownership of the ruined Carfax Abbey; though the deed looks authentic, Seward denies any foreigner's claim to Carfax's “holy ground.” He sent Jonathan Harker to cheat the boyar out of his claim; instead, Jonathan returned with a shattered mind. Suddenly, Jonathan utters the same phrase as the sisters—“the Lord of Cries”—but lapses back into unintelligibility. Jonathan's wife Lucy enters: while she mourns her husband's travail, it is also clear that she and Seward desire each other. In another lucid moment, Jonathan tells Seward “Now he has asked you once,” before being dragged off. An attendant gives Lucy the diary Jonathan kept while visiting the boyar; she leaves to study it. Alone, Seward imagines the portrait of his father telling him to continue to “repress, restrain;” that denial—of his feelings for Lucy, the legitimacy of the boyar's claim, and the threat to London—is what makes him strong.

MONTAGE Four locations. Lucy's bedroom; the Correspondent's newspaper office; the deck of the schooner Semele; and Jonathan's cell in Carfax Asylum. Lucy awakes, screaming, from a dream of an “Eastern prince,” who dares her to “ask for what you want; ask it in.” She opens Jonathan's diary. The Correspondent reports a strange and sudden storm. The captain and crew of the Semele report, with increasing terror, their suspicion that something alien is onboard the ship; sailor after sailor goes missing. Lucy reads that Jonathan encountered the three Sisters at the castle of the boyar; they, like the foreign prince in her dream, kept daring Jonathan to “ask for what he wants.” The Correspondent reports that when the Semele blew into view, it was manned only by corpse of its captain bound to its mainmast, and then some immense dog leapt onto the sand and ran away as soon as the ship crashed. Lucy closes the diary; Jonathan has a vision of the Lord of Cries.

THE STRANGER IN CHAINS Seward's office; the ruin of Carfax Abbey. Seward demands to interrogate the Sisters: Van Helsing tells him that they escaped during the storm which blew the Semele aground. They did find an intruder in Carfax Abbey, though, who resisted arrest as little as the Sisters did. Seward demands to see him, and guards bring in a lissome Stranger (Dionysus) dressed as the “Eastern prince” of Lucy’s dream—and who, Seward notes, casts no reflection in a mirror. He claims that he is the agent of Carfax Abbey’s rightful owner, who is also responsible for the enchantment of London’s women; as if in a dream, all in the office seem transported to the ruined chapel of Carfax Abbey, where the Stranger sings of savage but cathartic religious rites that took place in an ancient temple here before this Christian church replaced it. He promises that if the abbey is returned to its rightful owner, the plague will end and peace will return to London. Seward refuses, ordering the Stranger to his cell. “Now he has asked you twice,” Dionysus says, echoing Jonathan, before being led away. Van Helsing, fearful, implores Seward to yield; Seward refuses. Lucy, entering, learns from Van Helsing that Jonathan will never recover; she will be married to an invalid the rest of her life. Devastated, but denying it, she hands Seward Jonathan’s diary, daring him to “ask for what he wants”—that is, Lucy—the way the women dared Jonathan. Seward weakens, but will not yield. The earth rumbles; Dionysus, appearing in his true form, attended by the three Sisters, exhorts the city’s imprisoned young women to break loose from their chains. They escape; but, even as the asylum collapses, Seward vows never to surrender.

ACT II

DIALOGUE IN THE RUINS The ruined streets of London: a park in the distance. The Sisters praise the beauty of the devastated city. The Correspondent reports that no authorities can reach Carfax Asylum; all the maps lead, magically, elsewhere. Seward appears; the Sisters ask, one time more, on the Stranger’s behalf, if Seward will acknowledge his claim. Seward, for the third and final time, refuses. The Sisters, turning seductive, claim they know how Seward can stop the Stranger, but at one terrible cost; he will have to become as savage as he, and cut off the Stranger’s head. Seward resists—the Stranger is the animal, not he—but the Sisters dare him to acknowledge that he desires, one time only, to experience the freedom and ecstasy of being the beast. In an anguish of relief, Seward “asks for what he wants.”

LUCY AND THE WOLF-PRINCE Lucy’s bedroom. Lucy pleads for a response from Jonathan, but gets none. Dionysus, as the Wolf-Prince of another of Lucy’s dreams, appears; thinking she’s dreaming, she welcomes him for (what we learn is) the third time he’s appeared to her. She, too, notes that he casts no reflection. Dionysus asks her to “ask him in,” over the threshold; she declines. Lucy claims happiness, but Dionysus nudges her; is she truly happy that Jonathan is now a child to her, not a husband? That Seward continues to deny their love? Lucy claims that she’s happy because she’s virtuous; Dionysus challenges her that what she’s calling virtue is merely life-killing duty, and doesn’t she yearn to feel alive? Lucy yields, asks him in.

VENGEANCE OF THE LORD OF CRIES Gray, shadowy daybreak: the still-smoking ruins of the asylum. Van Helsing reveals how Seward, on horseback, stormed into the park, chasing the fleeing women. Seward appears, bloody, half-naked, ecstatic, holding what he thinks is the head of the Stranger; he calls on Lucy and London to celebrate how he has saved them. Slowly, painfully, Van Helsing talks Seward out of his trance; he makes him realize that, tricked by the Stranger, he’s actually beheaded Lucy. Dionysus, celebrating his vengeance, offers at last to show Seward and Van Helsing his reflection; we see only the devastated human characters. The Chorus laments Seward’s fate, warning the audience not to repeat his mistakes.

FROM THE CREATORS

by Mark Adamo

ON ECSTASY AND RUIN

Scapegoating: it is always with us. Whether it targets actual goats, as in Leviticus, or merely undocumented immigrants, as in today's America, the pattern persists. The anti-gay bishop dragged, blinking, from his boyfriend's bed; the attorney targeting all his city's prostitutes save those he frequents; the puppet of foreign interests railing against the 'rigged' process that elected him—what have they in common? Only this: the need to blame and attack others for that which we can neither resist, nor accept, in ourselves.

The most profound dramatic exploration of this theme, and the one best suited to the opera house, remains The Bacchae of Euripides, written 1600 years ago. Its plot is simple. A violent, ecstatic, foreign god inflames the women of Thebes and threatens to recruit them permanently unless their city accepts his divinity. The city's leader is, secretly, as curious and violent and desiring as the god is. But he cannot admit this. He denies the god, as a criminal, an alien, a fraud. The god gives the leader three chances to acknowledge his birthright. The leader refuses; once, twice, three times. After the third refusal, the god seduces the leader himself, and exacts upon him a terrible revenge.

Classics don't age. That's what makes them classics. But—while the theme of The Bacchae is timeless—the play's enmeshment in arcane high-Athenian religion can mask its relevance to a contemporary audience. I wanted to tell this story in an idiom clearly intelligible to modern listeners; The Bacchae remains a modern play. But I didn't want to locate it in so flatly contemporary a setting that the play's uncanniness would be lost.

And then I remembered Bram Stoker's Dracula, which is to The Bacchae what Nahum Tate's King Lear is to Shakespeare's: that is, the same story, with only a falsely happy ending distinguishing the compromised copy from the terrifying original. Euripides admitted what Stoker repressed: the monster isn't on the mountain, or in the city, but in the mirror. (Which is why the novel belongs to the history of horror, whereas the play belongs to History, period.)

I concluded that mapping Dracula onto The Bacchae could accomplish two things. By using only what the book shared with the play, I could strip away all the unnecessary Gothic kitsch of the novel. (This may be the first adaptation of the Stoker to feature not one coffin, corpse, or crucifix, nor a single drop of blood; indeed, the word vampire appears not at all in the libretto.) And because Stoker's Victorian England is more familiar to today's listeners than Euripides's Thebes is, the opera could use the novel to make the themes of The Bacchae clearer than even the original play could.

When researching another opera libretto I adapted from Greek sources, I came across the quote that “all classicism is neo-classicism”—meaning that, from earliest times, the past, in the theatre, has always been a mask we wear to speak more clearly about the present. I can't summarize more succinctly the method, and the goal, of The Lord of Cries.

PROGRAM NOTES

by Clifton Ingram

At first blush, Euripides's classical tragedy The Bacchae and Bram Stoker's epistolary novel Dracula may not appear to have much in common—after all, the two works were created over two thousand years apart. Yet the thematic connectivity of the two is exactly the premise of composer John Corigliano and librettist Mark Adamo's new opera, The Lord of Cries, which reimagines the ancient Greek tragedy as a 19th-century gothic horror story. As Adamo notes in his essay, the genesis of this mash-up stems from a desire to set the timeless themes of The Bacchae in a modern idiom. The choice to give the setting of Euripides a face-lift is not an unexpected one in contemporary theater these days, so Adamo's explanation begs the question: Besides an obsession with red liquids, what ties together these two stories beyond wine and blood? After all, one is about a power struggle between mortal and god, and the other a gothic mystery about a vampire.

As it happens, Corigliano and Adamo steal a page from Euripides and open their opera by letting Dionysus speak for himself. A brief prologue clears the air nicely, featuring the god of wine's declaration that he is returning “to another pristine city that lied about itself, to itself, and sacrificed its children before its illusions.” But first, Dionysus explains, he must find a new form suitable to reteach his “disconsolate lessons,” which humanity has forgotten since the original lesson in ancient Thebes. The ominous implication here is that the Greek god has chosen the role of the infamous vampire count, making him a kind of “Dionysus-cum-Dracula.” But what do Dionysus and the vampire Count have in common? How do these two characters fit together to reinforce Corigliano and Adamo's desires to reveal the timeless themes implicit in these literary sources? And what is the forgotten lesson that Dionysus wishes to teach again, anyway?

First, a primer might prove useful for those unfamiliar or in need of a refresher on Euripides's The Bacchae. The basic plot of the play is that Pentheus, the king of Thebes, refuses to acknowledge Dionysus as a son of Zeus, outright denying his godhood, and prohibits the practice of any of his rites in the city. The wine god had recently returned from exile in Asia and for this reason was seen as a foreign influence by some. For his continued denial of a god, King Pentheus is severely punished, driven mad, tricked by Dionysus, then killed. More specifically, he is torn apart by Maenads, a group of wine-frenzied women who partake in the drunken rites involved in worshiping Dionysus. To maximize the horror of this myth, amongst the Maenads are Pentheus's very own aunts and mother, Agave. (Notably, Adamo borrows Agave and her three sisters—Autonoe, Ino, and Semele—to name Dionysus-Dracula's three attendants, who wreak havoc in the opera, and to name the ghost ship on which the god-vampire arrives in London.)

One interpretation for Pentheus's denial of Dionysus's divine birthright is a xenophobic refusal of an outside encroaching power, especially one from the East. Euripides was writing in the second half of the 4th century BCE, when what we now call Greece had seen multiple military invasions from the Persian Empire. However, the ancient playwright had a reputation for expressing a unique and signature cynicism towards war and violence. An excellent example of this is the striking pathos for the conquered that is at the heart of The Trojan Women, an anti-war tragedy written a decade before The Bacchae. So Euripides's emphasis on empathy in the face of tragic violence makes this interpretation seem simplistic and even dubious.

However, it is still worth mentioning that Dionysus-Dracula experiences xenophobia in The Lord of Cries, as does Dracula in the novel. On more than one occasion in the opera, the Victorian-coded characters demonstrate the historical limits of their cultural perspectives in an attempt to dismiss the Lord of Cries as "some petty boyar from the East." In Stoker's Dracula, this kind of "othering" is also present: a literary effect, meant to enhance the vampire's mystique, an orientalist trope common in the gothic literature of the 19th century.

However, Corigliano and Adamo dig more deeply into another kind of othering: the distancing of oneself from one's desires. Indeed, the consequence of the repression of desire is Corigliano and Adamo's main theme—and Dionysus's forgotten lesson. King Pentheus's refusal of Dionysus is also a denial of his godly portfolio, which included wine, horticulture, fertility, inebriation, insanity, liberation, ritual madness, religious ecstasy, and the theater itself. Generally speaking, this makes Dionysus a god of desires. Especially applicable here is the kind of desire which is hidden or salacious, the kind that reveals itself when one has imbibed too much—in essence, the taboo, the kind of desire that makes up the undercurrent of the human psyche. So a refusal of Dionysus is also a refusal to acknowledge or accept one's own urges.

By setting their Dionysian tragedy in industrial London, Corigliano and Adamo's opera leans heavily on this "morality play of repressed desires" format: Dionysus has returned to the world disguised as Dracula to show the true power (and horror) of desires (especially repressed ones) that—despite the intervening millennia and all the progress in thought and technology since ancient Thebes—were still present in Victorian London and are still with us today, too. In the opera, John Seward takes on the role of King Pentheus, whose denial of the god-vampire is really more a denial of his own interest in and desire to take part in the dangerous reverie and havoc that the Lord of Cries is wreaking across London. Like Pentheus, the depths of Seward's repression—in this case, his attraction to Lucy, a married woman and the wife of a patient—is what causes his tragic undoing, manifesting in the extreme after being held in for so long. In this way, Adamo points out that "Euripides admitted what Stoker couldn't: that the monster isn't on the mountain, or in the city, but in the mirror. Which is what makes the novel thrilling, but the play profound."

At the same time, The Lord of Cries is clearly indebted to some of Stoker's thrills. The opera's score includes a quote from American philosopher Martha Nussbaum, who writes:

The theater is not so much the place where humans set themselves off from the rest of nature, secure in their moral virtue, but the place, instead, where these fluidities and insecurities are enacted, these risks explored. Where, with pity, terror, and peculiar awe, a community pieces itself together from the fragments of limbs torn in ecstatic rage. Dionysus presides.

This coming-together as an audience, bearing witness to destruction, ecstatic ruin, disembodiment, not to forget dismemberment—all fictional, of course, but still meaningful—is at the heart of what makes horror tick as a genre. In the genre of horror, there is a desire to unsettle and destabilize a sense of taste and morality—recalibrating one's view of reality itself—and to invert and subvert feelings of safety and danger. This is what makes the Dracula story such an apt choice for a recasting of the Euripidean tragedy. Our god-vampire tells us he is setting out to educate through disruption and then does so, in a rather arch flourish full of twisted irony. The Lord of Cries is a bit like a slasher flick, where we know the summer camp counselors are doomed from the get-go, but we have to watch the movie to find out all the creative ways the killer will get the job done. The surprises come in the unfolding of characters' certain fate, variations on a theme to appreciate for their creativity and nuance.

The opera is also a bit like a monster movie, where the quality of the entertainment is derived from the quality of the creature or evil. Despite the opera's emphasis on Seward's personal struggle, Dionysus-Dracula is the true protagonist of the work. This focus on the villain or anti-hero is very similar to something rather unique about Euripides's The Bacchae, as well—where the drama relies on the direct interaction between human and god. Typically in ancient Greek tragedy, the god would be introduced at the very end in an ex machina fashion, but instead Euripides uses the character Dionysus throughout the play as a foil to the imperfections of the other characters.

Even if Corigliano and Adamo dabble with horror, however, The Lord of Cries is still a tragedy at its ancient-Greek core, a genre akin to horror in that it is not so much about a surprise at the end but how the already-known ending comes to be. In a way, this is creating the unexpected from the expected. In this way, with The Lord of Cries Corigliano and Adamo fulfill the Euripides's parting lines as well:

The gods appear in many forms, carrying with them unwelcome things.
What people thought would happen never did.
What they did not expect, the gods made happen.
That's what this story has revealed.

CREATORS

JOHN CORIGLIANO Composer

The American John Corigliano continues to add to one of the richest, most unusual, and most widely celebrated bodies of work any composer has created over the last forty years. Corigliano's numerous scores—including three symphonies and eight concerti among over one hundred chamber, vocal, choral, and orchestral works—have been performed and recorded by many of the most prominent orchestras, soloists, and chamber musicians in the world. Recent scores include Conjurer (2008), for percussion and string orchestra, commissioned for and introduced by Dame Evelyn Glennie; Concerto for Violin and Orchestra: The Red Violin (2005), developed from the themes of the score to the François Girard's film of the same name, which won Corigliano the Oscar in 1999; Mr. Tambourine Man: Seven Poems of Bob Dylan (2000) for orchestra and amplified soprano, the recording which won the Grammy for Best Contemporary Composition in 2008; Symphony No. 3: Circus Maximus (2004), scored simultaneously for wind orchestra and a multitude of wind ensembles; and Symphony No. 2 (2001: Pulitzer Prize in Music.) Other important scores include String Quartet (1995: Grammy Award, Best Contemporary Composition); Symphony No. 1 (1991: Grawemeyer and Grammy Awards); the opera The Ghosts of Versailles (Metropolitan Opera commission, 1991, International Classical Music Award 1992); and the Clarinet Concerto (1977.) One of the few living composers to have a string quartet named for him, Corigliano serves on the composition faculty at the Juilliard School of Music and holds the position of Distinguished Professor of Music at Lehman College, City University of New York, which has established a scholarship in his name; for the past fourteen years he and his partner, the composer-librettist Mark Adamo, have divided their time between Manhattan and Kent Cliffs, New York.

MARK ADAMO Librettist

Hailed by The New Yorker as “one of America's most formidable lyric composers,” composer-librettist Mark Adamo made his mark on the opera world in 1998 with the debut of his first work Little Women, which The New York Times described as “a bona fide American classic.” Known for his “way of finding a drama's emotional nerve and projecting it to an audience,” (Financial Times, London) his four subsequent operas—Lysistrata, The Gospel of Mary Magdalene, Becoming Santa Claus, and The Lord of Cries—have “opened yet other pathways on his remarkable exploration of what an opera can be” (American Record Guide).

As opera and symphonic performances have resumed in 2021-2022, his work has returned to stages in Santa Fe (the celebrated world premiere of The Lord of Cries), San Francisco and Houston (the world premiere of Last Year: Concerto for Solo Cello and String Orchestra), Chicago (the regional premiere of Becoming Santa Claus), and London and Buenos Aires (the U.K. and Argentine premieres of Little Women).

Introduced by Houston Grand Opera in 1998 and revived there in 2000, Little Women is one of the most frequently performed American operas of the last twenty-five years; it has been given more than 140 national and international engagements. The Houston Grand Opera revival (2000) was telecast by PBS/WNET on Great Performances in 2001 and released on CD by Ondine that same year; in fall 2010, Naxos released this performance on DVD and on Blu-ray.

Comparable enthusiasm greeted the debut of Adamo's second opera—the larger-scaled Lysistrata, adapted from Aristophanes' comedy and including elements from Sophocles' Antigone. Lysistrata was commissioned by Houston Grand Opera for its 50th anniversary and introduced in March 2005. Its New York City Opera debut in March 2006 led to concert performances by Washington National Opera (May 2006) and Music at the Modern by the Van Cliburn Foundation (May 2007) before a new staging at Fort Worth Opera in May 2012. San Francisco Opera commissioned and introduced Adamo's The Gospel of Mary Magdalene in June of 2013, which re-centered the title character at the heart of the Christianity origin myth; and Becoming Santa Claus was commissioned and introduced by Dallas Opera in 2015 and released on DVD/Blu-Ray in September of 2017 before its recent Chicago revival.

Adamo began his education in the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University, where, as a freshman in the Dramatic Writing Program, he received the Paulette Goddard Remarque Scholarship for outstanding undergraduate achievement in playwriting. He went on to earn a Bachelor of Music Degree cum laude in composition in 1990 from the Catholic University of America. His music is published exclusively by G. Schirmer, Inc.

CAST

RACHEL BLAUSTEIN Autonoe

Praised for her “brilliant lyric soprano,” Rachel Blaustein is quickly gaining recognition for her riveting stage presence and innate musicality. Rachel was one of the ten national finalists for the 2022 Metropolitan Opera Laffont Competition, earning a spot as one of the next generation of Opera Stars, and winning the Fernand Lamesch National Finalist Award. This season, Ms. Blaustein will perform the role of the Countess Almaviva in Annapolis Opera's production of Le nozze di Figaro, and will be seen in concert with Opera Edwardsville and the Mid-Atlantic Symphony Orchestra. Rachel will also make recordings of both The Garden of the Finzi-Continis and The Lord of Cries, which have commercial releases in 2023.

Ms. Blaustein made her Santa Fe Opera debut in summer 2021 as Autonoe in the world premiere of John Corigliano's The Lord of Cries. Last season, she also made her Tulsa Opera debut as Lauretta in Gianni Schicchi and returned to Chicago Opera Theatre as Frasquita in Carmen, where she appeared previously as the Queer Kid in the Midwest premiere of Kamala Sankaram's Taking up Serpents and in Daniel Catan's La hija de Rappaccini. CREATIVE & PRODUCTION TEAM

GIL ROSE Artistic Director and Conductor

Gil Rose is one of today's most trailblazing conductors, praised as “amazingly versatile” (The Boston Globe) with “a sense of style and sophistication” (Opera News). Equally at home performing core repertoire, new music, and lesser-known historic symphonic and operatic works, “Gil Rose is not just a fine conductor, but a peerless curator, sniffing out—and commissioning—off-trend, unheralded, and otherwise underplayed repertoire that nevertheless holds to unfailingly high standards of quality. In doing so, he's built an indefinable, but unmistakable, personal aesthetic”

(WXQR). A global leader in American contemporary music, Rose is the founder of the performing and recording ensemble the Boston Modern Orchestra Project (BMOP), who “bring an endlessly curious and almost archaeological mind to programming... with each concert, each recording, an essential step in a better direction” (The New York Times), as well as the founder of Odyssey Opera, praised by The New York Times as “bold and intriguing” and “one of the East Coast's most interesting opera companies.”

Since its founding in 1996, the “unique and invaluable” (The New York Times) BMOP has grown to become the premier orchestra in the world for commissioning, recording, and performing music of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Under Rose's leadership, BMOP has won seventeen ASCAP Awards for Adventurous Programming, been selected as Musical America's Ensemble of the Year in 2016, and in 2021 was awarded a Gramophone Magazine Special Achievement Award in recognition of its extraordinary service to American music of the modern era. Under Rose's baton, BMOP has been featured at numerous festivals including the Festival of New American Music (Sacramento, CA), Concerts at the Library of Congress (Washington, DC), and the MATA Festival in New York.

In 2013, Gil Rose expanded his musical vision with the founding of Odyssey Opera, a company dedicated to eclectic and underperformed operatic repertoire from all eras. Working with an international roster of singers and directors, Odyssey has presented more than 35 operas in Boston, with innovative, thematically linked seasons. The company has also established itself as a leader of modern opera in the United States, having given three world premieres and numerous U.S. premieres.

In addition to his role as conductor, Rose is leading the charge for the preservation and advancement of underperformed works through recordings. BMOP/sound, the independent record label Rose founded in 2008, has released over 86 recordings of contemporary music by today's most innovative composers, including world premieres by John Cage, Lukas Foss, Chen Yi, Anthony Davis, Lisa Bielawa, Steven Mackey, Eric Nathan, and many others. With Rose as executive producer, the label has secured five GRAMMY® nominations and a win in 2020 for Tobias Picker's opera Fantastic Mr. Fox. Odyssey Opera's in-house label has released five CDs, most recently a complete version of Camille Saint-Saëns's Henry VIII.

Beyond Boston, Gil Rose enjoys a busy schedule as a guest conductor and educator. Equally at home on the podium in both symphonic and operatic repertoire, Rose has led performances by the Tanglewood Opera Orchestra, the Netherlands Radio Symphony, the American Composers Orchestra, the National Symphony of Ukraine, the Matsumoto Festival

In addition to being former faculty at Tufts University and Northeastern University, Rose has worked with students across the U.S. at institutions such as Carnegie Mellon University, MIT, New England Conservatory, and the University of California at San Diego. THE BOSTON MODERN ORCHESTRA PROJECT is the premier orchestra in the United States dedicated exclusively to commissioning, performing, and recording music of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. A unique institution of crucial artistic importance to today's musical world, the Boston Modern Orchestra Project (BMOP) exists to disseminate exceptional orchestral music of the present and recent past via performances and recordings of the highest caliber. Hailed as "one of the most artistically valuable [orchestras] in the country for its support of music either new or so woefully neglected that it might as well be" by The New York Times, BMOP was the recipient of Musical America's 2016 Ensemble of the Year award, the first symphony orchestra in the organization's history to receive this distinction.

Founded by Artistic Director Gil Rose in 1996, BMOP has championed composers whose careers span nine decades. Each season, Rose brings BMOP's award-winning orchestra, renowned soloists, and influential composers to the stage of Boston's premier venues in a series that offers the most diverse orchestral programming in the city. The musicians of BMOP are consistently lauded for the energy, imagination, and passion with which they infuse the music of the present era. BMOP was selected as Musical America's 2016 Ensemble of the Year, the first symphony orchestra to receive this distinction. In 2021, Gramophone magazine bestowed BMOP with a Special Achievement Award in recognition of their service to American music.

BMOP's distinguished and adventurous track record includes premieres and recordings of monumental and provocative new works such as John Harbison's ballet Ulysses, Charles Wuorinen's Haroun and the Sea of Stories, and Lei Liang's A Thousand Mountains, A Million Streams. A perennial winner of the ASCAP Award for Adventurous Programming, the orchestra has been featured at festivals including Opera Unlimited, the Ditson Festival of Contemporary Music with the ICA/Boston, Tanglewood, the Boston Cyberarts Festival, the Festival of New American Music (Sacramento, CA), Music on the Edge (Pittsburgh, PA), and the MATA Festival in New York. BMOP has actively pursued a role in music education through composer residencies, and collaborations with colleges. The musicians of BMOP are equally at home in Symphony Hall, Weill Recital Hall at Carnegie Hall, and in Cambridge's Club Oberon and Boston's Club Café, where they pursued a popular, composer-led Club Concert series from 2003 to 2012.

BMOP/sound, BMOP's independent record label, was created in 2008 to provide a platform for BMOP's extensive archive of music, as well as to provide widespread, top-quality, permanent access to both classics of the 20th century and the music of today's most innovative composers. BMOP/sound has garnered praise from the national and international press; it is the recipient of eight Grammy Award nominations and its releases have appeared on the year-end "Best of" lists of The New York Times, The Boston Globe, National Public Radio, Time Out New York, American Record Guide, Downbeat Magazine, WBUR, NewMusicBox, and others. In 2020, BMOP/sound won the Grammy for Best Opera Recording for Tobias Picker's Fantastic Mr. Fox.

BMOP expands the horizon of a typical "night at the symphony." Admired, praised, and sought after by artists, presenters, critics, and audiophiles, BMOP and BMOP/sound are uniquely positioned to redefine the new music concert and recording experience.
